

There are moments in life when you are forced to stop and honestly look at yourself. My suspension from Kabarak University has been one of those moments for me. It was not something I expected to experience during my first year of university, and it has been difficult to deal with. I have had to think about my education, my future, the people who believed in me, and, most importantly, the choices that brought me to that point.

At first, my thoughts were mostly about what I was going to lose. I was worried about missing part of my studies and about how the suspension would affect my academic progress and the opportunities I had worked hard to receive. I was also disappointed in myself. But as the situation continued, I realized that spending all my time thinking about the consequence would not help me grow. I needed to honestly ask myself what I could learn from what had happened.

That process has not always been comfortable. I have had to accept that there were things I could have handled differently. I have learned that taking responsibility is not just saying that I am sorry or accepting a punishment. It also means being willing to examine my decisions, understand their consequences, listen to correction and make changes that can be seen in my actions.

During this period, I started reading J. Oswald Sanders' Spiritual Leadership. I did not initially pick up the book because of my suspension. However, as I read it, some of its ideas became very relevant to what I was experiencing. Sanders' emphasis on character, discipline, responsibility and the way a person responds when tested made me rethink my understanding of leadership. I began to realize that leadership is not mainly about having a position or being seen as a leader. It is also about how I conduct myself when nobody is applauding me, when I am corrected and when things do not go the way I expected.

I also read Neil T. Anderson's The Bondage Breaker. What stood out to me was the importance of examining the patterns in my thinking and refusing to allow a difficult experience to become my identity. The book challenged me to take greater responsibility for the way I think and respond. I do not want to use my circumstances as an excuse for my choices. At the same time, I have learned that making a mistake does not mean that I have to remain the same person who made it.

My faith has become more important to me during this period. There were times when I prayed mainly because I wanted my situation to change. With time, my prayers also became about asking God to help me understand what I needed to change in myself. I have had to learn patience, humility and the ability to accept that growth can sometimes happen through experiences that I would never have chosen for myself.

The suspension has also made me think seriously about the kind of nurse I want to become. Nursing is not only about passing examinations or acquiring clinical skills. It involves trust, responsibility, discipline and accountability. A patient has to be able to trust the person caring for them. That has made me take my own character more seriously. I want to become a nurse who can be trusted not only because of what I know, but also because of how I conduct myself.

I have also had to reconsider what leadership means to me. I have been involved in different activities where I have had opportunities to lead and serve, but this experience reminded me that leadership begins with leading myself. Before I can expect other people to trust my judgment, I need to be willing to examine my own judgment. I need to listen, accept correction and think about how my actions affect other people.

I do not want to pretend that this experience has made me a completely different person overnight. I am still learning, and I know that change has to be demonstrated over time. Reading these books and reflecting on my faith has not erased what happened, and I do not expect it to. What has changed is the way I look at it. I now see the suspension not only as a consequence that I have had to face, but also as a moment that has made me more aware of the person I want to become.

I cannot undo what happened. What I can do is learn from it and make better choices going forward. I want to return to my education with greater maturity, discipline and awareness of my responsibilities. I want my actions in the future to show that I took this experience seriously.

I do not want my suspension to be the final description of who I am. I want it to be one difficult chapter in a much larger story—one that taught me to take responsibility, accept correction, seek God, and keep growing. I am not claiming that I have everything figured out. I am simply choosing to learn from this experience and to become a person who is more responsible, more disciplined and more prepared to serve others than I was before it happened.
